

4

THE POLITICS OF CLASS ACTION ARBITRATION: JURISDICTIONAL LEGITIMACY AND VINDICATION OF CONTRACT RIGHTS

---

A. The Problematic Nature of Collective Action		Excess of authority	105
Two cases, one theme	97	Defining the class	110
Politics and judicial attitudes	99	C. Freedom of Contract and Class Action Waivers	111
Enter investor protection	102	AT&amp;T Mobility and the nature of arbitration	111
Taxonomy: class actions, consolidation and joinder	103	Lower court reactions	112
B. Award Vacatur and Contract Interpretation	104	D. Looking to the Future	114
Parcel Tankers and antitrust	104	E. Conclusion: Efficiency and Consent	115

---

A. The Problematic Nature of Collective Action

Two cases, one theme

Exactly one year apart, the U.S. Supreme Court decided two cases on “class arbitration” proceedings, one about international shipping and the other on consumer purchases of mobile telephones. Each decision inflicted damage on a claimant’s right to invoke collective action in arbitrations. Read together, the opinions serve as a prism through which to refract key elements in an increasingly politicized debate on the legal framework for arbitration, particularly within the United States.

In Stolt-Nielsen v. AnimalFeeds, an arbitral tribunal had been constituted to hear antitrust claims arising from maritime agreements for transport of liquids such as food oils and chemicals.<sup>1</sup> Asked to interpret a series of charter-parties negotiated by experienced business managers, the tribunal rendered a unanimous award saying that the contract language permitted class proceedings. Having determined that the agreements authorized class arbitration, the arbitrators' next job would have been to determine whether the case should in fact go forward on that basis, an exercise involving evaluation of various criteria, such as the existence of common questions of law and fact, relevant to the appropriateness of class rather than bilateral action. Only then would the tribunal proceed to rule on the merits of the claims.

---

* Portions of this chapter have been adapted from a presentation at the Cour d’appel d Paris on 11 May 2012, titled “Le caractère définitif de la sentence” and forthcoming in volume 2012 Revue de l’arbitrage.

<sup>1</sup> Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int’l Corp., 130 S. Ct. 1758 (2010). Opinion by Justice Alito joined by Justices Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Kennedy. Dissent by Justice Ginsburg joined by Justices Breyer and Stevens. Justice Sotomayor took no part in the case, having been on the Second Circuit during the appeal. However, shortly thereafter she cast her vote with the same dissenters in Rent-A-Center v. Jackson, 130 S. Ct. 2772 (2010), a case in which Scalia, writing for the majority and joined by Alito, Roberts, Thomas and Kennedy, held that an arbitrator not a court should address challenge to an arbitration clause in an employment contract.

The arbitrators never got the chance to take the next steps, however. A majority of the Supreme Court decided that by construing the contracts as having authorized class arbitration, the arbitral tribunal exceeded its authority. The award was then remanded to the lower court to be vacated.<sup>2</sup> For the majority, respondents' failure to consent to class proceedings trumped any efficiency benefits from collective arbitration such as the sharing of costs that might otherwise inhibit pursuit of claims.

Twelve months later, in AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, the same Court addressed arbitration arising from a federal court action brought by consumers against the manufacturer of cellular telephones.<sup>3</sup> The standard-form sales contracts provided for arbitration, but prohibited class proceedings. Relying on an earlier California judicial ruling striking down such prohibitions as unconscionable, the lower federal courts refused to compel arbitration. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that state rules barring class action waivers ran afoul of federal law.<sup>4</sup>

Vigorous dissents were issued in each instance. In Stolt-Nielsen the dissenters contended that the arbitral process had not yet reached a point ripe for judicial review. Moreover, the arbitrators were simply doing what the parties instructed them when designating the American Arbitration Association (AAA) Supplementary Rules on Class Arbitration as the framework for the arbitration. In AT&T Mobility, the dissent authored by Justice Breyer stressed the advantages of class arbitration, and argued that the California rule on waivers fell within the role accorded to state law in determining the validity of arbitration agreements.

The comment triggered by these cases has explored the dispute resolution's fairness, a capacious notion that incorporates a responsibility to hear before deciding (due process), its respect for the contours of arbitral jurisdiction (whether imposed by contract or public policy) and the general duty of impartiality and independence.<sup>5</sup> Controversy has addressed <sup>2</sup> A federal district court had initially vacated the award for "manifest disregard of the law," but was then reversed by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. Although accepting that "manifest disregard" existed as a ground for annulment, the Court of Appeals considered that the standard had not been met under the facts of the instant case.

<sup>3</sup> AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011). Justice Scalia delivered the opinion of the Court, joined by Justice Roberts, Alito, Thomas and Kennedy. The dissent by Justice Breyer was joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor and Kagan. Following Stolt-Nielsen, Justice Kagan had been appointed by President Obama to succeed Justice Stevens, who had earlier expressed serious concerns about arbitration in a dissent in Mitsubishi Motors v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, 473 U.S. 614, 666 (1985).

<sup>4</sup> AT&T Mobility (n. 3) 1753. The majority's reasoning was adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Kilgore v. KeyBank, Nat. Ass'n,—F.3d— 2012), 2012 WL 718344, in which the court held that a California law prohibiting arbitration of claims for public injunctive relief was not a ground that "exist[s] at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract," and was accordingly preempted to the extent that it purported to invalidate agreements to arbitrate such claims.

<sup>5</sup> See generally, William W. Park, Les devoirs de l'arbitre: ni un pour tous, ni tous pour un, Cahiers de l'arbitrage 13 (2011).

not only the fairness of the format for adjudication, whether collective or bilateral, but also that of the forum, whether public courts or private arbitration.<sup>6</sup>

Politics and judicial attitudes

The ideological overtones of these two decisions will not escape careful observers, aware of how class arbitration in the United States tends to implicate passions associated with “business vs. consumer” conflicts. Indeed, shortly after AT&T Mobility, the New York Times carried a scathing editorial describing the decision as “a devastating blow to consumer rights” that would “bar many Americans from enforcing their rights in court [and in many cases] from enforcing rights at all.”<sup>7</sup>

In the context of current American political debate, four of the five judges striking down the award in Stolt-Nielsen, and confirming the class waivers in AT&T Mobility, would be described as conservative: Justices Alito, Roberts, Scalia and Thomas.<sup>8</sup> The dissents came from Court members all of whom would be considered to the left of those in the majority: Justices Ginsburg, Stevens, Breyer and Sotomayor, along with Justice Kagan, whom President Obama appointed to succeed Justice Stevens after his retirement.

Normally inclined to endorse arbitration as consistent with freedom of contract,<sup>9</sup> the right side of the American political spectrum remains skeptical about class proceedings, seen as a tool of lawyers taking cases on a contingency basis for a portion of the judgment or settlement. By contrast, for those thought of as leaning to the left politically, class actions present themselves as a mechanism to promote consumer and employment claims which, because of the small individual recovery, might not otherwise be brought either in court or in arbitration.

Support of class action arbitration does not necessarily mean satisfaction with arbitration itself. Within the United States, complaints against arbitration of consumer and employment disputes have been raised not only by journalists, but also by legal scholars in popular as well as academic literature. Arbitration has often been portrayed as a way to sidestep the perceived safeguards of a civil jury in favor of more “pro-business” arbitrators.<sup>10</sup> A quarter of <sup>6</sup> See generally, Alan Scott Rau, Arbitral Power and the Limits of Contract: The New Trilogy, 22 Am. Rev. Int'l Arb. 435 (2011); Thomas J. Stipanowich, The Third Arbitration Trilogy: Stolt-Nielsen, Rent-A-Center, Concepcion and the Future of American Arbitration, 22 Am. Rev. Int'l Arb. 323 (2011). See also, Judith Resnik, Fairness in Numbers: A Comment on AT&T v. Concepcion, Wal-Mart v. Dukes and Turner v Rogers, 125 Harv. L. Rev. 78 (2011), exploring class proceedings in court as well as arbitration.

<sup>7</sup> Gutting Class Action, N.Y. Times, 12 May 2011.

<sup>8</sup> In each case they were joined by Justice Kennedy, often deemed a centrist swing vote.

<sup>9</sup> For comment on arbitration by a scholar usually associated with the “law and economics” movement, see Eric A Posner, Arbitration and the Harmonization of International Commercial Law, 39 Virg. J. Int'l Law 647 (1999). See also Eric A Posner, Should International Arbitration Awards be Reviewable?, 94 Am. Soc'y Int'l L. Proc. 126 (April 2000), suggesting that courts “should not review arbitration awards except to ensure that arbitrators have jurisdiction and do not violate mandatory legal rules.” Professor Posner continues that nothing in his analysis turns on whether arbitrators are better or worse than courts in general, but rather what is important is that “parties have the freedom to choose between arbitration and courts.” In what appears as an article of faith he adds: “If they have this freedom, they will simply choose the superior forum.”

<sup>10</sup> See Amalia D. Kessler, Stuck in Arbitration, N.Y. Times op-ed, print version, 7 March 2012, A27; earlier electronic publication, 6 March 2012. Professor Kessler argues that “arbitration decisions do not need to be based on the law; arbitrators have their own procedures, and some studies have found that they are systematically biased in favor of the companies that hire them,” and that “ordinary citizens are increasingly being forced into arbitration under the guise of free contract”. Compare Thomas Stipanowich, The Arbitration Fairness Index: Using a Public Rating System to Skirt the Legal Logjam and Promote Fairer and More Effective Arbitration of Employment and Consumer Disputes, 60 U. Kansas L. Rev. Symposium “Perspectives on the Current State of Arbitration Law” (November 2011 <<http://www.law.ku.edu/publications/lawreview/symposium>>), in which the author proposes “a public rating system assessing the fairness of arbitration programs associated with a century ago, in the landmark Mitsubishi decision allowing arbitration of antitrust claims, a dissent by Justice Stevens declared that: “Consideration of a fully developed record by a jury, instructed in the law by a federal judge, and subject to appellate review, is a surer guide to the competitive character of a commercial practice than the practically unreviewable judgment of a private arbitrator.”<sup>11</sup>

Resistance to arbitration from the liberal side of the aisle has also worked its way into legislation reducing the vitality of arbitration clauses in consumer and employment contracts.<sup>12</sup> Notably, the pending Arbitration Fairness Act provides that ‘no pre-dispute arbitration agreement shall be valid or enforceable if it requires arbitration of an employment dispute, consumer dispute, or civil rights dispute.’<sup>13</sup> The bill’s preamble includes a proposed finding that “decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States have changed the meaning of the [Federal Arbitration] Act” so that it now extends to consumer and employment disputes in a way that “undermines the development of public law because there is inadequate transparency and inadequate judicial review of arbitrators’ decisions.”

The politicization of arbitration in the United States derives in large measure from two idiosyncrasies of American legal culture. The first lies in the absence of any general nationwide statute to insulate consumers and employees from abusive arbitration arrangements. The second rests in the availability of civil juries to decide ordinary contract cases. Arbitration thus commends itself to those with doubts about the reliability of such juries, often perceived as rendering unreasonable verdicts tainted with bias against manufacturers and employers.<sup>14</sup>

With greater or lesser degrees of nuance, political scientists and journalists attempt to chart the ideology on judicial decisions, in the sense that certain judges tend to vote together.<sup>15</sup> The so-called “Martin-Quinn Scores” use a scale with negative numbers translating to liberalism, and positive numbers translating to conservatism. Thus Justice Douglas, considered a very liberal judge, received an average ideological score of minus 4, while a score of positive 4.30 was accorded the conservative Justice Rehnquist.<sup>16</sup> contracts for consumer goods or services, or individual employment contracts—what we call an ‘Arbitration Fairness Index.’”

---

<sup>11</sup> Mitsubishi Motors v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, 473 U.S. 614, 666 (1985).

<sup>12</sup> See e.g. Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act of 2010, Pub. L. 111–203, 124 Stat. 1376–2223. See also Department of Defense Regulation Restricting the Use of Mandatory Arbitration Agreements, 48 C.F.R. §§ 212, 222, 252 (2010).

<sup>13</sup> Section 402, Senate Bill 987, Arbitration Fairness Act of 2011, 112th Congress, 1st Session, introduced 12 May 2011 by Senator Franken. See also Department of Defense Regulation Restricting the Use of Mandatory Arbitration Agreements, 48 C.F.R. §§ 212, 222, 252 (2010).

<sup>14</sup> For an intriguing case on the law applicable to determination of whether class actions are permissible even outside the arbitration context, see Shady Gove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Insurance Co., 130 S. Ct. 1431 (2010).

<sup>15</sup> See e.g. Jeffrey A. Segal and Harold J. Spaeth, The Supreme Court And the Attitudinal Model Revisited (CUP, 2002). Explaining the “attitudinal” model of Supreme Court decisions, the authors venture, “Simply put, Rehnquist votes the way he does because he is extremely conservative; Marshall voted the way he did because he was extremely liberal.” Ibid. 86. For a journalist’s take, see Adam Liptak, Court Under Roberts Is Most Conservative in Decades, N.Y. Times, Sunday 25 July 2010, 1, 20 et seq.

<sup>16</sup> See generally Andrew Martin, Kevin Quinn and Lee Epstein, The Median Justice on the U.S. Supreme Court, 83 North Carolina L. Rev. 1275 (2005); Lee Epstein, Andrew Martin, Kevin Quinn and Jeffrey Segal, Ideological Drift Among Supreme Court Justices: Who, When and How Important, 101 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1483 (2007); Lee Epstein and Tonja Jacobi, Super Medians, 61 Stan. L. Rev. 37, 99 (2008). For comment on the Martin-Quinn scores, see Ward Farnsworth, The Use and Limits of Martin-Quinn Scores to Assess Supreme Court Justices, with Special Attention to the Problem of Ideological Draft, 101 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1891 (2007). See also Ward Farnsworth, Signatures of Ideology: The Case of the Supreme Court’s Criminal Docket, 104 Mich. L. Rev. 67 (2005).

Less successful has been the establishment of any intellectually rigorous way to connect the dots among the disparate questions that work their way into the right-left debate, such as criminal procedure, competition law, healthcare, taxes, gun control, a Christmas crèche on the village green, campaign finance, affirmative action, gay marriage and abortion. Notions of being a “fiscal” rather than a “social” conservative, which appeal to many Americans, provide some refinement on the theme, while still leaving open what exactly makes a position left or right.<sup>17</sup>

Likewise, it is less than self-evident how such inclinations have come to figure so prominently in the area of arbitration, with its protean quality of changing from context to context. The choice to arbitrate, rather than proceed to otherwise competent courts, justifies itself differently depending on whether the final and binding private adjudication relates to labor disputes, construction contracts, commercial transactions, international finance, or investor allegations of host state expropriation, to mention just a few of arbitration’s incarnations.

The elusiveness of political categories in arbitration also manifests itself through inter-temporal shifts from one generation to another. A half century ago, liberal judges tended to wax eloquent about the benefits of arbitration, in the context of labor disputes<sup>18</sup> or construction cases,<sup>19</sup> providing many “pro-arbitration” passages that have since become locus classicus. In all instances, labels remain highly sensitive to cultural and geographical context. The bar to arbitration of consumer disputes, while radical in the United States, has long been the norm in Europe.<sup>20</sup>

The complexity of arbitration’s political ideology also presented itself in the investor-state dispute resolution provisions of the U.S.-Korean Free Trade Agreement, contested by the South Korean left but likely to appear progressive to those living north of the 38th parallel.<sup>21</sup> After the ruling conservative Saenuri Party succeeded in having the Free Trade Agreement adopted in late 2011, the more liberal opposition proposed renegotiation of the treaty’s

<sup>17</sup> Traditionally, American conservatives would have seen themselves as cautious toward change, claiming hallmarks of small government and free enterprise as exemplified in classic works by William F. Buckley (God and Man at Yale, 1952) and Barry Goldwater (Conscience of a Conservative, 1960). By contrast, liberal figures such as Kingman Brewster and William Sloane Coffin would claim trademarks as advocates for greater social and economic equality. See generally, Geoffrey Kabaservice, The Guardians (2004); Warren Goldstein, William Sloane Coffin Jr. (2004). Of course, such characterizations suffer in the current world of “neoconservatives” and the Occupy Wall Street movement, with some traditional conservatives lamenting a movement hijacked by oversimplified capitalism and imprudent foreign adventure, and some on the left worrying that protest movements lack focused programs.

<sup>18</sup> See the opinions by Justice Douglas, a classic liberal, in the “pro-arbitration” decisions in Textile Workers Union of America v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448 (1957) and the so-called “Steelworkers Trilogy” which includes United Steelworkers of America v. American Mfg. Co., 363 U.S. 564; United Steelworkers of America v. Warrior & Gulf Nav. Co., 363 U.S. 574; United Steelworkers of America v. Enterprise Wheel & Car Corp., 363 U.S. 593 (1960).

<sup>19</sup> See e.g. Moses H. Cone v. Mercury Construction, 460 US 1 (1983), where Justice Brennan, considered a liberal, wrote for the majority which ordered arbitration, while the dissent was penned by Justice Rehnquist, a conservative.

<sup>20</sup> The European Union has long restricted consumer arbitration. European Council Directive 93/13/EEC, implemented through national legislation such as the English Arbitration Act 1996, §§ 89–91. Even apart from the EU Directive, many European countries restrict consumer arbitration by statute. In France, a pre-dispute clause compromissoire (contrasted to the post-dispute compromis) has long been valid only as between merchants (commerçants) or persons contracting with respect to a professional activity. French Code Civil, Art. 2061.

<sup>21</sup> See generally Chung Min-uck, Opposition pledges to scrap KORUS FTA after taking power, Korea Herald, 8 February 2012.

investor-state arbitration provisions, arguing that arbitration's alleged impartiality was more illusion than reality.<sup>22</sup>

Enter investor protection

A few months after the decision in AT&T Mobility, the tribunal in an international arbitration known as Abaclat rendered a jurisdictional award which wrestled with similar questions about class arbitration.<sup>23</sup> The claims had been brought by an association acting as agent for approximately sixty thousand Italian bondholders,<sup>24</sup> including some added after the claims were initially filed, dissatisfied by Argentine debt restructuring following the 2001 economic crisis.

Filed pursuant to the Italian-Argentine investment treaty, the Abaclat case took a different direction from the U.S. Supreme Court decisions. The majority took jurisdiction over the collectively-filed claims, while the dissenting arbitrator expressed concerns about the appropriateness of such proceedings.<sup>25</sup> Citing both Stolt-Nielsen and AT&T Mobility, the dissent endorsed the reasoning in both judgments as underscoring the fundamental differences between bilateral and class representative proceedings which, he wrote, required some "special consent of the parties" not to be assumed from a simple commitment to arbitrate.<sup>26</sup>

International arbitration between investors and host states implicates a shift in the political labels of those for or against class proceedings. Financial interests, considered as relatively conservative in the sense of resisting uncompensated governmental takings, urge investor-state arbitration beyond the traditional bilateral paradigm. Any jurisdictional risks stemming from the atypical dynamics of class proceedings seem outweighed by the prospect of enhancing the vindication of contract rights.

In Abaclat the majority saw the "mass action" not as a matter of jurisdiction, but rather of procedural "admissibility" presenting few comparisons to American-style class-action arbitration. The majority emphasized that the tribunal had jurisdiction over each individual claim, and found that no separate, specific consent was required with regard to the form of the proceeding. According to the majority: "Assuming that the Tribunal has jurisdiction over the claims of several individual Claimants, it is difficult to conceive why and how the <sup>22</sup> Discussion focused, inter alia, on the 1998 NAFTA arbitration in the Loewen case, which rejected a Canadian request for compensation in connection with a Mississippi state court trial generally considered xenophobic from start to finish. One Korean press report cited political pressure on Abner Mikva, an arbitrator in the Loewen case, by a U.S. Justice Department official who suggested that the arbitral tribunal should deny liability because "if we [the United States] lose this case we would lose NAFTA." Jung Eun-joo, Unearthed documents illustrate pitfalls of ISD clause, Hankyoreh, 3 January 2012. On Loewen, see generally William W. Park and Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez, The New Face of Investment Arbitration, 28 Yale J. Int'l L. 365 (2003).

<sup>23</sup> Decision on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Abaclat & Others (formerly Giovanna A Beccara & Others) v. Argentine Republic, ICSID Case ARB 07/15, majority opinion by Pierre Tercier and Albert Jan van den Berg, 4 August 2011; dissent by Georges Abi-Saab, 28 October 2011. As is well-known to those familiar with investor-state arbitration, awards rendered pursuant to the rule of International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes, a World Bank affiliate, are often published with consent of the parties.

<sup>24</sup> The Associazione per la Tutela degli Investitori in Titoli Argentini, often called "Task Force Argentina" (or TFA) filed its claim on 14 September 2006. For procedural reasons a Registration Notice by the ICSID Secretariat did not follow until 7 November 2007.

<sup>25</sup> Decision on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Abaclat & Others (formerly Giovanna A Beccara & Others) v. Argentine Republic, ICSID Case ARB 07/15, majority opinion by Pierre Tercier and Albert Jan van den Berg, 4 August 2011; dissent by Georges Abi-Saab, 28 October 2011. As is well-known to those familiar with investor-state arbitration, awards rendered pursuant to the rule of International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes, a World Bank affiliate, are often published with consent of the parties.

<sup>26</sup> Abi-Saab Dissent, paras. 150–153.

Tribunal could [lose] such jurisdiction where the number of Claimants outgrows a certain threshold.”<sup>27</sup>

Taxonomy: class actions, consolidation and joinder

For American and non-American audiences alike, confusion may exist between “class” and “consolidated” arbitration.<sup>28</sup> The former would normally be contemplated when stakes in any individual case remain small enough to make bilateral arbitration impractical from a cost standpoint. By contrast, consolidation implicates several cases each of which would proceed on a stand-alone basis, but which present related parties as well as common issues of law and fact, making it more economical for the claims to be heard together by a single tribunal.

In “class” arbitration, self-selected claimants represent others entitled to similar or analogous recovery. Assuming the relevant contract language can be construed to permit class arbitration, an arbitral tribunal would normally need to decide whether class proceedings justify themselves according to the types of factors relevant in class actions brought in federal court. Such criteria include not only common issues, but also a finding that the representatives and their counsel will fairly and adequately protect the class interests.

Consolidation, on the other hand, involves independent but related actions, without any one individual or entity standing as representative for others, even if each side engages a team of common counsel. Consequently, concerns about the fairness of group representation would normally be absent.<sup>29</sup> All of the lawsuits would otherwise go forward individually. Consolidation simply promotes efficiency.<sup>30</sup>

The difference between “class” and “consolidated” proceedings was recently addressed in an appellate decision involving insurance arbitration, where the court essentially left the arbitral tribunal to decide (as an initial matter, at least) whether to consolidate several proceedings.<sup>31</sup> Following Florida litigation by healthcare providers against every Blue Cross insurance plan in the United States, a dozen plans requested indemnity from their captive insurer pursuant to an errors-and-omissions policy. Failing to get satisfaction, the plans filed consolidated arbitration claims against the captive, which asked a federal district court to order what it called “de-consolidation” of the proceedings.

Declining to hear an appeal from a lower court decision appointing a third arbitrator, and refusing to de-consolidate the proceedings, the Court of Appeals addressed the special aspects of class arbitration.<sup>32</sup> These included the importance of determining adequacy of

<sup>27</sup> Majority Award, para. 490.

<sup>28</sup> On the distinction between consolidated and class proceedings, see generally, Charles Silver, Comparing Class Actions and Consolidations, 10 Review of Litigation 495 (1990–91); Richard Jeydel, Consolidation, Joinder and Class Actions, 57 Dispute Res. J. 2 (Nov.–Dec. 2002).

<sup>29</sup> In judicially-ordered consolidation, a judge would normally have discretion to consolidate without regard to the type of safeguards which impose themselves on class proceedings, such as the adequacy of counsel. Compare consolidation pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 42(a), with class actions pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 23.

<sup>30</sup> Compare Rules 23, 42(a).

<sup>31</sup> See Judge Easterbrook’s opinion in Blue Cross Blue Shield of Mass. v. BCS Ins. Co., 2011 Westlaw 638 2203 *4 (7th Cir. 2011).

<sup>32</sup> In its attempt to persuade the Court of Appeals to hear the appeal, the captive insurer had styled its application as a motion to compel arbitration, which would have been easier under the Federal Arbitration Act, § 16(a)(1)(B) (hereinafter FAA) which permits appeal only from orders denying petitions for arbitration. The Court had little difficulty cutting through form to substance, and in so doing seemed to enjoy finding support both in Ludwig Wittgenstein’s Philosophical Investigations. In passing, Judge Easterbrook also cited President representation, and the prospect that a respondent might face one large claim for aggregate damages rather than simply a multiplicity of potential, yet unrealized, small arbitrations.

Had the case been brought on a “class” basis, the appellate court seemed to accept that judicial intervention may have been appropriate, to ascertain whether the parties had in fact agreed to something other than bilateral arbitration. However, the proceedings at issue merely consolidated several cases that would otherwise have been brought individually, thus presenting no urgency to remove the matter from arbitral determination, subject to whatever later judicial review might be open under the Federal Arbitration Act for excess of authority.

One final precision might be in order with respect to the exercise of “joining” parties in arbitration, sometimes referred to as “extending” the arbitration clause. Attempts to join parties to arbitral proceedings might be made as part of an offensive strategy, by a claimant seeking to add a respondent’s parent company in the hope of insuring assets sufficient to satisfy any award. Or the tactic might be defensive, by a respondent seeking the benefit of an arbitral clause signed by an affiliate, as a prospect more appealing than an unwanted American jury trial.<sup>33</sup>

In some instances the joinder might be pursued by reference to explicit provisions of institutional arbitration rules,<sup>34</sup> while in others events may be pressed simply by reference to general principles of alter ego, “corporate veil” piercing, or implied agency.<sup>35</sup> In all instances, however, the addition of a claimant or a respondent does not change the fundamental nature of the arbitration itself.

B. Award Vacatur and Contract Interpretation

Parcel Tankers and antitrust

Few matters prove as slippery as the allocation of tasks between judges and arbitrators in commercial disputes. A choice to arbitrate implicates waiver of access to otherwise competent courts in favor of adjudication which is both private and binding. Respect for this bargain means that judges normally should not disturb an arbitrator’s substantive conclusions.

Unlike the merits of a dispute itself, however, an arbitrator’s jurisdiction must necessarily fall within the province of judicial review. No reason exists for a court to defer to arbitrators on

---

Abraham Lincoln’s question about how many legs a donkey would have if we call its tail a leg. The answer, of course, was only four, since calling the tail a leg did not make it one.

<sup>33</sup> The protean nature of collective arbitration has often been made even more complex by the term “mass” proceedings, often pressed into service for extraordinary events such as adjudication of Holocaust-related insurance claims through the ICHEIC process conducted in London, or claims to Swiss bank accounts through the Claims Resolution Tribunal in Zürich. See Howard M. Holtzmann and Edda Kristjansdottir (eds.), International Mass Claims Processes (OUP, 2007).

<sup>34</sup> See e.g. London Court of International Arbitration Rules (1998 Version), Art. 21.1(h) and International Chamber of Commerce Rules (2012 Version), Art. 7, which provides joinder procedures distinct from those of Article 10 related to consolidation.

<sup>35</sup> American courts, of course, are well aware of the various theories on which non-signatories might be joined in arbitration. See Arthur Andersen v. Carlisle, 129 S. Ct. 1896 (2009) (addressing notions of third party beneficiaries). For an intriguing cross-Channel debate on the matter, see Dallab Real Estate and Tourism Holding Co. v. Gov’t of Pakistan, [2010] UKSC 46. Although the British Supreme Court held that there was no justification to join the government of Pakistan, an analogous decision by the Paris Cour d’appel came to the opposite conclusion, dismissing a challenge to an award against the state. Paris Cour d’appel, 17 February 2011. See generally William W. Park, “Non-Signatories and International Contract” in Permanent Court of Arbitration (ed.), Multiple Party Actions in International Arbitration 3 (2009).

matters never given to them for decision. Courts understandably hesitate to enforce decisions by arbitrators who have clearly ignored the contours of their mandate.

This sensible delineation of tasks inheres in most modern arbitration statutes, including the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), which empowers courts to vacate awards “where the arbitrators exceeded their powers.”<sup>36</sup> Award annulment would not be appropriate, however, simply because a judge disagrees with the award on questions of law or fact submitted to arbitration.<sup>37</sup>

The majority decision in Stolt-Nielsen,<sup>38</sup> although paying lip service to this division of labor, effectively ignored the distinction in their disposition of a case brought against owners of ships commonly known as Parcel Tankers, used to carry liquids. Alleging price-fixing and other anti-competitive practices,<sup>39</sup> the shippers that had chartered the vessels requested a single proceeding to address their combined claims, borrowing the term “class action arbitration” from American court procedures. All shippers (the owners’ customers) had accepted charter-parties (leases for use of the vessels) which included similar arbitration clauses.

Not surprisingly, the shippers would have seen benefit to collective proceedings, permitting them to muster greater legal firepower and to reduce legal costs which in turn would enhance the value of bringing the litigation.<sup>40</sup> By contrast, the owners preferred bilateral litigation strategy, which would have the effect of reducing the cost-benefit ration of the lawsuit for each claimant.

After a district court had ordered the related actions to be heard together,<sup>41</sup> the parties agreed to constitute a tribunal pursuant to the American Arbitration Association’s Supplementary Rules on Class Arbitration (AAA Supplementary Rules) to address whether the various arbitrations could and should proceed on a class basis.<sup>42</sup> In a partial award, the arbitrators construed the arbitration clause to permit class arbitration, which might be ordered at a subsequent stage upon a finding of certain prerequisites, such as common questions of law and fact among the class members. That path must have seemed conducive to a more efficient process, with savings in time and cost from grouping related claims into a single case.

Excess of authority

The “silent” clause

The shipowners were not impressed by the asserted efficiencies that might derive from class arbitration. Their motion to vacate the award was sustained by a majority of the U.S. Supreme

---

<sup>36</sup> 9 U.S.C. §10(a)(4) (1925).

<sup>37</sup> With respect to foreign awards, Article V of the 1958 New York Arbitration Convention applies a similar principle, denying recognition if the arbitration agreement was “not valid” or the award contains decisions “beyond the scope of the submission to arbitration.”

<sup>38</sup> Stolt-Nielsen (n. 1).

<sup>39</sup> In a companion criminal case, Stolt-Nielsen itself had admitted to engaging in an illegal cartel. United States v. Stolt-Nielsen, S.A., 524 F. Supp. 2d 586 (E.D. Pa. 2007).

<sup>40</sup> See generally Robert G. Bone, Civil Procedure: The Economics of Civil Procedure (Foundation Press, 2003).

<sup>41</sup> See Re Parcel Tanker Shipping Services Antitrust Litigation, 296 F. Supp. 2d 1370, 1370–1 (J.P.M.L. 2003).

<sup>42</sup> AnimalFeeds brought the claim on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated in a putative class action under FRCP, Rule 23 against Stolt-Nielsen, Odjell, Jo Tankers, and Tokyo Marine. Ibid. 1371; FED. R. CIV. P. 23.

Court, finding that the arbitrators had exceeded their authority by imposing personal policy views, rather than deciding pursuant to applicable law.<sup>43</sup>

A somewhat unusual feature of the case served as the basis for the Court's decision. The litigants had concluded a post-dispute stipulation concluded by the parties confirming that their contracts contained "no agreement" on the matter of class action arbitration.

Significantly, the Court did not say that parties must agree explicitly to class arbitration, but simply that the case at bar implicated no agreement, whether express or implied. Indeed, the Court added in a significant footnote: "We have no occasion to decide what contractual basis may support a finding that the parties agreed to authorize class-action arbitration."<sup>44</sup> Consequently, not all arbitration clauses which are silent on class actions need be interpreted by federal courts as prohibiting class actions, at least absent a stipulation like the one in Stolt-Nielsen to the effect of "no agreement" on the matter.<sup>45</sup>

A strong dissent authored by Justice Ginsburg contended that the arbitrators were simply doing what the parties had instructed them. The AAA Supplementary Rules, accepted by all litigants, empowered arbitrators to decide whether the dispute should proceed on a class-action basis.<sup>46</sup>

Under the facts of Stolt-Nielsen, the dissent's argument has significant force. No question was raised about the bona fide of the counsel representing the claimant shippers. All claimants appear to have agreed to arbitration with all respondents, leaving open, however, the question of whether the arbitration should proceed on a bilateral or a collective basis. Given that arbitration remains a creature of contract, there was nothing odd in the parties deciding to craft the scope of questions to be submitted to the arbitral tribunal, which through incorporation of the AAA Rules included interpretation of controverted charter-party contracts. One side said the contract language did permit class proceedings, to which "not so" was effectively the other side's reply.

Not all cases yield to such analysis, however. One can imagine, for example, significant complications from an agreement to arbitrate the matter of class entitlement, but concluded by a self-appointed representative which did not in fact speak for a class, a matter discussed more fully later in this chapter.

<sup>43</sup> In remanding the case to the lower court for further proceedings consistent with the Supreme Court's opinion (namely award vacatur), Justice Alito wrote: It is only when [an] arbitrator strays from interpretation and application of the agreement and effectively "dispense[s] his own brand of industrial justice" that his decision may be unenforceable. In that situation, an arbitration decision may be vacated under FAA, § 10(a)(4) on the ground that the arbitrator "exceeded [his] powers," for the task of an arbitrator is to interpret and enforce a contract, not to make public policy. In this case, we must conclude that what the arbitration panel did was simply to impose its own view of sound policy regarding class arbitration. Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1767–1768.

<sup>44</sup> See ibid. 1776, note 10.

<sup>45</sup> See Jock v. Sterling Jewelers Inc., 646 F.3d 113 (2nd Cir. 2011); petition for certiorari denied, U.S. S. Ct., 2012 WL 895979 (Mem), 19 March 2012. A group of retail sales employees filed a discrimination claim against their employer. The Court of Appeals held that the arbitrator did not exceed her authority in determining that the arbitration agreement permitted employees to proceed with their effort to certify class in arbitration proceedings against employers.

<sup>46</sup> Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1777. Rule 3 of these AAA Supplementary Rules grants the arbitrators jurisdiction to determine whether the arbitration might, as a matter of contract, proceed on behalf of a class, assuming satisfaction of the relevant criteria for class certification set forth in Rule 4, which parallel factors in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See American Arbitration Association, AAA's Supplementary Rules for Class Arbitration, Rules 3 and 4, available at <<http://www.adr.org/sp.asp?id=21936>> (last visited 20 March 2011); FED. R. CIV. P. 23.

The right answer to the wrong question

In noting the problematic nature of class-action arbitration, the majority may well have conflated two distinct matters: (i) monitoring arbitral jurisdiction, which falls to courts, and (ii) deciding the substantive merits of the parties' dispute, which falls to arbitrators.<sup>47</sup>

Although Justice Alito was clearly right that the parties stipulated that their contracts contained "no agreement" on class-action arbitration. However, the litigants had unequivocally asked arbitrators, not judges to construe their ex ante intent on class arbitration.<sup>48</sup> Article 3 of the AAA Supplementary Rules, titled "Construction of the Arbitration Clause," provides the arbitrators with an explicit grant of jurisdiction as follows:

Upon appointment, the arbitrator shall determine as a threshold matter, in a reasoned, partial final award on the construction of the arbitration clause, whether the applicable arbitration clause permits the arbitration to proceed on behalf of or against a class (the "Clause Construction Award").<sup>49</sup>

The parties thus requested the arbitrators not the courts, to address whether the arbitration clause permitted the case to proceed on behalf of a class.<sup>50</sup> The litigants moved that question to the realm of the dispute's substance, normally within the purview of the arbitrators.

The majority gave the right answer to the wrong question. The relevant inquiry facing the Court was not, "What did the parties agree in general?" but the more limited issue, "What did the parties agree to arbitrate?" By accepting the AAA Supplementary Rules, the parties gave to the arbitrators the question of whether the contract allowed class-action arbitration, thus generally precluding judicial second-guessing on that matter.<sup>51</sup> Courts might still intervene to monitor bias or lack of due process, but not to correct a simple mistake in the arbitrators' contract interpretation.<sup>52</sup>

The majority opinion in Stolt-Nielsen risks decreasing the finality of commercial arbitration, thus defeating the parties' aim that their dispute be decided by arbitrators not judges. Few would disagree that arbitrators must remain faithful to the parties' contract, not create new public policy.<sup>53</sup> Unfortunately, the majority opinion took that general proposition as an avenue to justify award annulment simply because the arbitrators got it wrong on a question submitted for their determination. In doing so, the Court ruled on a substantive issue

<sup>47</sup> See generally William W. Park, The Arbitrator's Jurisdiction to Determine Jurisdiction, 13 ICCA Congress Series 55 (Albert Jan Van Den Berg (ed.), 2007).

<sup>48</sup> Brief in Opposition at 2, Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 130 S. Ct. 1758, 1768 (2010).

<sup>49</sup> American Arbitration Association (n. 12). Moreover, Rule 3 recognizes that such a determination will be considered an award subject to review pursuant to the delineated grounds for vacatur, but no more, as provided in the FAA. The point of Rule 3 is to construe the contract, as a threshold matter, to determine whether the parties agreed to submit their dispute to class arbitration at all.

<sup>50</sup> The applicability of these AAA procedures was explicitly recognized by the majority. Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1765.

<sup>51</sup> For an example of a decision following this line of argument, see SouthernLinc Wireless v. Thomas, 2011 WL 5386428 (N.D. GA 2011), in which the District Court held that the arbitrator did not exceed his authority because, "the parties . . . specifically granted the arbitrator the power to interpret their agreement and decide whether it authorized class actions, both in writing and by their conduct."

<sup>52</sup> See John M. Townsend, The Rise and Fall of Class Arbitration, 2011 AAA Y.B. on Arbitration and the Law 395, 407 (opining that "The Supreme Court simply felt that the arbitrators got the answer wrong, but the statute provides no basis for a court to correct a mere error on the part of arbitrators"). See also S. I. Strong, Opening More Doors than it Closes, 2010 Lloyd's Maritime & Consumer L.Q. 565 (Nov. 2010), for a scholarly perspective on the effect of Stolt-Nielsen in future cases.

<sup>53</sup> The Stolt-Nielsen majority opinion at 1767–68 declared that the award must be vacated because the tribunal simply "impose[d] its own view of sound policy regarding class arbitration."

within the arbitrator's jurisdiction, thus exceeding the judiciary's own legitimate role in the process.

In this connection, one must again note what the Court did not do. There was no declaration that class arbitration was per se a non-arbitrable process by reason of some public policy for which the judiciary serves as custodian. Nor did the Court suggest that claimants' counsel would not adequately represent the interests of all shippers included in the proceedings. Rather, the decision rested purely on a divergent interpretation of the contract language, with the reviewing judges reading the charter-parties differently from the arbitrators.

The nature of arbitral authority

The majority invoked excess of authority by the arbitral tribunal, one of the limited statutory grounds for vacatur under the FAA.<sup>54</sup> Under the facts of the case, however, the Court may well have blurred the distinction between excess of jurisdiction and simple mistake of law, dressing the latter in the garb of the former.

Of course a robust definition of excess of authority has often proved difficult.<sup>55</sup> On the basis that litigants do not expressly empower arbitrators to make mistakes, at least one judge has gone so far as to suggest that errors always constitute an excess of authority.<sup>56</sup>

Such an approach, however, ignores the fact that the parties asked an arbitrator to decide the case, assuming the risk that the arbitrator might get it wrong. The integrity of the arbitral process requires not only that judges scrutinize gateway questions related to the contours of the litigants' agreement to arbitrate, but equally that they respect the arbitrators' decisions on issues given to arbitrators for adjudication.

One might draw a distinction between two types of legitimacy. The first being legitimacy of the arbitral process, which might be threatened by arbitrators who exceed their consent-based jurisdiction. A second level of legitimacy relates to the role of the judiciary. A court can and should intervene to ensure the procedural fairness of hearings, in matters such as the right to be heard and respect for the arbitrator's mission. However, when courts begin second-guessing an arbitrator's decision on the substance of the dispute entrusted to him by the litigants, arbitration awards cease to have the bargained-for finality expected by the litigants.

An earlier U.S. Supreme Court decision implicitly recognized the distinction between the merits of a case and arbitral jurisdiction. Addressing a dispute between a New York merchant and an Illinois store owner before arbitrators who ultimately awarded damages to the ill-treated storekeeper. Having lost in arbitration, the unhappy New Yorker succeeded in having the award set aside by a lower court. The Supreme Court reversed with the following reasoning:

If the award is within the submission, and contains the honest decision of the arbitrators, after a full and fair hearing of the parties, a court of equity will not set it aside for error, either in law

<sup>54</sup> The exclusivity of the FAA as the source for vacatur grounds was declared by the U.S. Supreme Court in Hall Street Assocs., LLC v. Mattel, Inc., 552 U.S. 576 (2008).

<sup>55</sup> Attempts to define jurisdiction sometimes bring to mind the line by U.S. Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart, admitting an inability to define "hard core" obscenity but adding, "I know it when I see it." Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 197 (1964).

<sup>56</sup> The great English jurist Lord Denning once suggested (albeit in an administrative context) that "Whenever a tribunal goes wrong in law it goes outside the jurisdiction conferred on it and its decision is void." See Lord Denning, The Discipline of the Law 74 (1979).

or fact. A contrary course would be a substitution of the judgment of the chancellor [the judiciary] in place of the judges chosen by the parties [the arbitrators], and would make an award the commencement, not the end, of litigation.<sup>57</sup>

Put differently, an unhappy loser in a fair proceeding should not be permitted to renege on the bargain to arbitrate simply when a decision proves not to their liking.

There is nothing unusual in saying that parties express their intent to arbitrate matters which might otherwise be jurisdictional in nature. For example, allegations that the signature in an arbitration clause had been forged would normally give rise to a judicial review. Yet it would always be up to the parties to agree that the allegation of forgery should be arbitrated,<sup>58</sup> in which case the arbitrator would be the one to determine the genuineness of the signature.<sup>59</sup>

Of course, arbitrators might simply invent a legal standard informed only by their personal policy preferences.<sup>60</sup> In such an instance, they would be exceeding their authority and detracting from arbitral legitimacy.

The facts of Stolt-Nielsen, however, do not lend themselves to painting the arbitrators as such wild cards. Although the Court's aversion to class arbitration proceedings may be understandable, the parties asked the arbitrators, not the courts, to construe their agreement by their adoption of the AAA Supplementary Rules. The arbitrators' understanding of the law had been made on the basis of the earlier U.S. Supreme Court decision where a mere plurality of the Court held that determinations on consolidation were for the arbitrators themselves.<sup>61</sup> The legacy of this case was anything but clear. None of the four opinions commanded a majority.

Although stressing that the award was not yet "ripe" for review, the opinion by Justice Ginsburg acknowledged the effect of the agreement to apply the AAA Supplementary Rules. Her dissent notes: "The parties' supplemental agreement, referring the class-arbitration issue to an arbitration panel, undoubtedly empowered the arbitrators to render their clause-construction decision. That scarcely debatable point should resolve this case."<sup>62</sup> Put differently, the job of construing the contract's scope on the matter of class arbitration had been expressly conferred on arbitrators, not judges.

<sup>57</sup> Burchell v. Marsh, 58 U.S. 344, 349 (1855).

<sup>58</sup> With respect to the very existence of an agreement to arbitrate (such as that raised by the allegations of forgery), a separate post-dispute agreement to arbitrate would normally be needed to confer arbitral jurisdiction. By contrast, with respect to procedural matters (such as respect for time limits) the parties might well confer arbitral authority in a single contract containing a clear mandate for arbitration. See Howsam v. Dean Witter, 537 U.S. 79 (2002) addressing the right to interpret a requirement that arbitration be filed within six years after "the occurrence or event giving rise to the dispute."

<sup>59</sup> Such delegation of jurisdictional authority in a separate agreement is exactly what happened in Astro Valiente Compania Naviera v. Pakistan Ministry of Food & Agriculture (The Emmanuel Colocotronis No. 2), [1982] 1 All ER 823, [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 286 (QB, Commercial Court).

<sup>60</sup> The sting in the majority's vacatur of the award lies in the line, "what the arbitration panel did was simply to impose its own view of sound policy regarding class arbitration." Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 130 S. Ct. 1758, 1767–68.

<sup>61</sup> See Green Tree Fin. Corp. v. Bazzle, 539 U.S. 444 (2003).

<sup>62</sup> Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1780. The plurality felt that the arbitrator should decide whether the parties' agreement allowed for class action arbitration. Justice Stevens concurred with the outcome but did not endorse its reasoning. The dissent by Chief Justice Rehnquist argued that the parties' contract demonstrated no consent to class action arbitration. The dissent by Justice Thomas noted that the case originated before South Carolina state courts, and contended that the FAA did not apply to state proceedings. In the context of the point made by Justice Thomas, it is interesting that Stolt-Nielsen implicated a maritime matter, falling within the purview of federal rather than state law.

Defining the class

The calculus for judicial intervention changes, however, if no subsequent agreement exists to refer the matter to construction pursuant to the AAA Supplementary Rules. Under the factual matrix of Stolt-Nielsen, everyone had in fact signed arbitration agreements. In such circumstances, the dangers, milder in magnitude when speaking in relative terms, were simply that arbitrators might erroneously presume an intent to permit collective (rather than bilateral) proceedings among entities that had already consented to renouncing their recourse to courts. The greater disruption lurks in the possible extension of class proceedings to include persons who never signed arbitration agreements at all, most likely the next step for those who press to import true American-style class proceedings into arbitration.<sup>63</sup>

The AAA Supplementary Rules provide criteria for class certification, setting forth factors that largely parallel those in Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. If arbitrators have found that the contract permits class action arbitration, they will proceed to determine whether the various proceedings should go forward on a class basis. Pursuant to prerequisites in Article 4 of those Supplementary Rules, one or more claimants may represent a class only if each of the following conditions is met:

- (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of separate arbitrations on behalf of all members is impracticable; (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class; (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class; (5) counsel selected to represent the class will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class; and (6) each class member has entered into an agreement containing an arbitration clause which is substantially similar to that signed by the class representative(s) and each of the other class members.

The final prerequisite of Rule 4(6) speaks of each class member having entered into an agreement containing an arbitration clause substantially similar to the one signed by the class representative. The sounder approach to such language will be to require a true bilateral arbitration clause, not simply a unilateral post-dispute “opt-in” process. Lacking reciprocity, a unilateral “opt-in” would derogate from the abecedarian principle that arbitration (unlike court proceedings) presupposes genuine consent, not simply post-dispute attachment to a class for litigation convenience.

Under the facts of Stolt-Nielsen, all owners and all customers had agreed to arbitrate with each other through clauses in the charter-parties.<sup>64</sup> No question had been raised about the good faith or adequacy of the counsel representing the class in proceedings which simply moved things from bilateral to multilateral proceedings, without deeming into life an agreement to arbitrate where none had existed.

Class arbitration would change dramatically, however, if a unilateral “opt-in” process were to bring into the arbitration potential claimants with which respondents had never concluded

---

<sup>63</sup> Statutory court-ordered consolidation of arbitral proceedings is a different matter, given that all parties would presumably be subject to the relevant judicial jurisdiction. See e.g. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 251, § 2A (2010), allowing consolidation as provided in the Massachusetts Rules of Civil Procedure, which in Rule 42 permits joinder of actions “involving a common question of law or fact.” Mass. R. Civ. P. 42 (2008). The provision was applied in New England Energy v. Keystone Shipping, 855 F. 2d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1988), which held that a federal district court could grant consolidation pursuant to Massachusetts state law where the parties’ agreement was silent on such matter. See also Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 90 § 7N1/2 (1998), requiring non-voluntary arbitration of claims over allegedly defective vehicles.

<sup>64</sup> Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1765.

any arbitration agreement at all. Like marriage, commercial arbitration implicates mutual consent, not an open-ended option to be exercised by a host of partners.

C. Freedom of Contract and Class Action Waivers

AT&T Mobility and the nature of arbitration

In Stolt-Nielsen an arbitral award had been rendered, with the courts coming into the act to second guess the arbitrators' decision. By contrast, judges may sometimes preclude arbitrators from ever hearing a matter at all, as happened when the validity of class actions waivers was called into question in AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion.<sup>65</sup>

In a consumer complaint against the manufacturer of mobile telephones, the standard-form sales contracts provided for arbitration, but prohibited class proceedings. Relying on an earlier California judicial ruling striking down such prohibitions as unconscionable, the district court refused to compel arbitration.

The Supreme Court reversed, saying that the Federal Arbitration Act preempted state rules barring class-action waivers. Whether right or wrong, the majority opinion by Justice Scalia tended to obscure intellectually rigorous debate by suggesting that any switch from bilateral to class arbitration "sacrificed the principal advantage of arbitration—its informality. . . ." <sup>66</sup> He then noted that class arbitration requires procedural formality, to insure adequate representation of absent class members, notice to absent members, and an opportunity to opt out, before concluding that Congress would not have left the imposition of such procedural requirements to an arbitrator.<sup>67</sup>

One can only speculate on where, in the Federal Arbitration Act or its legislative history, support might be found for such a single-dimension view of the arbitral process, particularly in a world with a multitude of publications witnessing to the arbitration of large multinational contract disputes and the increasingly public field of investor-state arbitration pursuant to bilateral investment treaties and free trade agreements. On its face at least, the Federal Arbitration Act says simply that arbitration agreements will be enforced according to their terms, whether such agreements relate to big contracts or small.

A sounder underpinning for the decision might have rested on the observation that the state-law doctrine invalidating class-action waivers (the so-called "Discovery Bank" rule) required certain categories of disputes to be litigated in court, rather than arbitrated. It was precisely this type of state "non-arbitrability" rule that the Federal Arbitration Act was intended to preempt.

Although Justice Scalia did not provide much guidance on whether "manifest disregard of the law" continued as a separate ground for award vacatur, his opinion did cite the limited nature of judicial review as another ground for invalidating class-action waivers. According to the majority opinion: "We find it hard to believe that defendants would bet the company with no effective means of review, and even harder to believe that Congress would have intended to allow state courts to force such a decision.”<sup>68</sup>

<sup>65</sup> AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740 (2011), 563 U.S.—(2011).

<sup>66</sup> 131 S. Ct. 1751.

<sup>67</sup> The majority also noted, quite rightly, that the risk of error increases during class proceedings, yet glossed over the many high stakes arbitrations which already occur.

The thoughtful concurrence by Justice Thomas provided what may be a more persuasive approach, looking first to Section 2 of the Federal Arbitration Act which makes an arbitration agreement valid except on grounds that may exist for contract revocation. He read that provision in tandem with Section 4, which calls for courts to compel arbitration “in accordance with the terms of the agreement.” Construing the two sections together, the concurrence suggests that only state law contract defenses concerning formation of the arbitration agreement (such as fraud or duress) could serve as a basis to decline enforcement of the clause.<sup>69</sup>

The dissent by Justice Breyer stressed the advantages of class arbitration, and argued that the California rule on waivers fell within the role accorded to state law in determining the validity of arbitration agreements. Asking rhetorically what rational lawyer would have agreed to represent the named claimants in the case, for the possibility of recovering $30.22 in damages, the dissent concluded that the alternative to class action would not be millions of individual actions, but none at all.

Lower court reactions

Amex merchants

Such decisions on class arbitration have already resulted in push-back from lower courts. In a multiple-stage antitrust case brought by merchants against a charge card issuer, the Second Circuit invalidated class-action waivers in arbitration even after two remands for reconsideration.<sup>70</sup>

The named claimants, companies in California and New York as well as a national trade association, sought to represent all merchants which had agreed to accept Amex cards. Although happy for the business from “charge” cards (simply a means of payment), the merchants objected to having to honor “credit” cards permitting customers to finance purchases over time, apparently issued to a less-affluent group of customers than the charge card holders. Claimants argued that the Amex “Honor All Cards” policy constituted an illegal “tying” arrangement in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

The American Express card acceptance agreements allowed either side to resolve claims by arbitration. However, the contracts also provided that the choice of arbitration by either side precluded the merchant from participating “in a representative capacity or as a member of any class of claimants” during the arbitration proceedings.

Rightly or wrongly, the appellate court found that high cost of “bilateral” arbitration would effectively preclude vindication of statutory rights. On the first reconsideration, directed in light of Stolt-Nielsen, as well as its second reconsideration, following AT&T Mobility, the Second Circuit found its original analysis unaffected, and declared the arbitration clause unenforceable. Relying on testimony of an economist who opined that the cost of an economic antitrust study might fall between “several thousand dollars” and “in excess of $1 million” the Court found the arbitration clause unenforceable.<sup>71</sup>

<sup>68</sup> The Scalia opinion did mention that FAA § 10 “focuses on misconduct rather than mistake” (ibid. 1752), perhaps suggesting that any residual “manifest disregard” must be found as a subset of the excess of authority.

<sup>69</sup> Ibid. 1754.

<sup>70</sup> Re American Express Merchants Litigation (“Amex I”), 554 F. 3d 300 (2nd Cir. 2009); Re American Express Merchants Litigation (“Amex II”), 634 F. 3d 187 (2nd Cir. 2011); Re American Express Merchants Litigation (“Amex III”), 2012 WL 284518 (2nd Cir. 2012).

An order to arbitrate on a class-action basis was not an option in light of Stolt-Nielsen, which requires agreement on the matter. Thus the Second Circuit simply concluded that the arbitration clause itself was unenforceable, and remanded to the district court with instructions to deny the motion to compel arbitration. In doing so the appellate court was careful not to suggest that all class-action waivers were to be deemed per se unenforceable. Rather, its analysis rested on the proposition that in the instant case the only economically feasible means for enforcing rights under competition law was via class action. If the arbitration clause precluded such proceedings, then the agreement to arbitrate was unenforceable.

Such an approach leaves litigants in a difficult position. If a contract contains a class-action waiver, a judge is unable to compel class proceedings. Yet the same judge might feel unable to grant a motion for non-class arbitration, considering bilateral proceedings to be unconscionable because the cost denies the claimant an ability to enforce statutory rights on an individual basis. The dilemma is certain to stimulate practitioners to focus more on drafting arbitration clauses,<sup>72</sup> whether within the framework of consumer transactions or business-to-business contracts.<sup>73</sup>

Choice-of-law principles

In an interesting case decided as this chapter goes to press, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals addressed the interaction of class-action waivers and choice-of-law rules.<sup>74</sup> A federal district court sitting in Washington had refused to compel arbitration and struck down an arbitration clause requiring bilateral arbitration, finding the clause “substantively” unconscionable pursuant to a Washington state law invalidating class-action waivers in arbitration.

In light of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in AT&T Mobility v Concepcion, the Court of Appeals held that federal law preempted state law invalidating the class-action waiver. However, the case was remanded so that the lower court could examine procedural unconscionability, related to general contract defenses such as fraud and duress, not specific to arbitration.

The parties’ agreement had provided for application of the law of the state of the plaintiff’s billing address. Consequently, the district court was directed to examine the choice-of-law rules in Washington applicable to the procedural unconscionability arguments, which had not earlier been addressed.

<sup>71</sup> Re American Express Merchants Litigation (“Amex III”), 2012 WL 284518 (2d Circuit 2012), *7, citing testimony from one Gary L. French, Ph.D.

<sup>72</sup> See Paul Friedland and Michael Ottolenghi, Drafting Class Action Clauses After Stolt-Nielsen, 65 Dispute Res. J. 22 (May–Oct. 2010), who suggest explicitly addressing the question of class action arbitration in the arbitration clause to avoid any confusion resulting from how future courts will interpret Stolt-Nielsen.

<sup>73</sup> Justice Ginsburg’s dissent noted that the parties in Stolt-Nielsen were sophisticated businesses with sufficient resources and experience to bargain, rather than parties subject to contracts of adhesion. Whether this argument cuts in favor or against a presumption to allow class action arbitration remains an open question. Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1783.

<sup>74</sup> Coneff v. AT&T Corp., 2012 WL 887598 (9th Cir. 2012), reversing the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington. Federal courts exercising jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship apply the choice-of-law rules of the forum state. Thus the district court was directed to look to the conflicts principles of the state of Washington.

D. Looking to the Future

Evaluating the recent class-action cases remains a daunting task, both descriptively and normatively. If scholars could predict the future they would likely be in another business. In particular, the peculiar facts of Stolt-Nielsen limit its precedential value, given that the decision rests on an explicit “no agreement” stipulation not likely to be repeated if the parties resisting class arbitration have competent counsel.

The great risk of Stolt-Nielsen is that its approach will be pressed into service to justify award annulment in cases where judges differ with arbitrators on the substantive outcome of a case. Indeed, the decision enhances the prospect that arbitration will become mere foreplay to litigation, given the way the Supreme Court ignored the litigants’ explicit agreement to submit to arbitration the very question of whether class proceedings were authorized.

Likewise, the case will provide little guidance on factors that might demonstrate the parties’ intent to permit class arbitration. In a key footnote, the majority in Stolt-Nielsen punts to future decisions the important question of how to define the contours of an agreement to class action proceedings, stating: “We have no occasion to decide what contractual basis may support a finding that the parties agreed to authorize class-action arbitration.”<sup>75</sup>

Nor will the Court’s discussion assist in addressing the much vexed matter of whether “manifest disregard of the law” continues to exist as an independent ground for review of arbitral awards.<sup>76</sup> Stolt-Nielsen says that if such a standard exists, it was satisfied under the facts of the case, thus leaving the vitality of the doctrine open to question.<sup>77</sup> In AT&T Mobility Justice Scalia does provide a tantalizing hint, saying that Section 10 of the Federal Arbitration Act “focuses on misconduct rather than mistake” thus perhaps suggesting that any residual “manifest disregard” must be found as a subset of the excess of authority.<sup>78</sup>

Whether judges outside the United States will stay court actions in conflict with class arbitration remains equally unclear. In the context of litigation in France or England, for example, it is far from evident that a court would refuse to hear a claim merely because the respondent, benefiting from no pre-existing arbitration agreement, had simply opted into American class arbitration.

<sup>75</sup> See Stolt-Nielsen 130 S. Ct. 1782, note 10.

<sup>76</sup> First introduced in dictum of the 1953 U. S. Supreme Court decision Wilko v. Swann, “manifest disregard of the law” has raised considerable concern in some quarters. See e.g. the opinion by Chief Judge Posner in Baravati v. Josephthal, Lyon & Ross, Inc., 28 F. 3d 704, 706 (7th Cir. 1994), which refers to the doctrine as having been “Created ex nihilo [as] a nonstatutory ground for setting aside arbitral awards.” Judge Posner, continued: “If [manifest disregard] is meant to smuggle review for clear error in by the back door, it is inconsistent with the entire modern law of arbitration. If it is intended to be synonymous with the statutory formula that it most nearly resembles—whether the arbitrators ‘exceeded their powers’—it is superfluous and confusing.”

<sup>77</sup> See Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S. Ct. 1768, note 3: “We do not decide whether ‘manifest disregard’ survives . . . as an independent ground for review or as a judicial gloss on the enumerated grounds for vacatur set forth at 9 U.S.C. § 10.” The Court then continued, “Assuming, arguendo, that such a standard applies, we find it satisfied for the reasons that follow [in the majority opinion].” Whether “manifest disregard of the law” exists as an independent ground for judicial review of awards was put into doubt by the 2008 Supreme Court decision in Hall Street Assocs. v. Mattel, Inc., 552 U.S. 576 (2008).

<sup>78</sup> AT&T Mobility, (n. 65) 1752.

E. Conclusion: Efficiency and Consent

Debate over class action arbitration highlights a stubborn tension in binding private dispute resolution. Collective action sometimes promotes a form of efficiency in the vindication of rights which enhances arbitration's role in promoting economic cooperation. Yet the legitimacy of the arbitral process depends on having claims decided in a manner consistent with the limits of arbitral authority contained in the parties' consent, respect for which does not always marry well with consent-based legitimacy.

Human nature being what it is, the character of the substantive claims to be decided often affects how competing considerations get weighed in resolving this tension between efficiency and consent-based legitimacy. Rightly or wrongly, claims of consumer fraud and employment discrimination evoke different "a priori" sympathies from those triggered by actions to enforce the rights of creditors or investors. Not infrequently, political, social and cultural predispositions affect how we balance costs and benefits of rival reactions to a perceived injustice.

In the domestic American context, collective arbitration may pit consumers against manufacturers, workers against their bosses, shippers against vessel owners. For the claimants, class proceedings provide a more efficient path to recover damages for alleged fraud, unfair dismissal, or overcharging. Not surprisingly, the manufacturer, employer or shipowner, on the receiving end of the complaints, may see the process as a form of litigation terrorism conducted mainly to benefit of the plaintiffs' lawyers.

A different color often attaches to collective arbitration in the international realm. The claimants might be well-heeled bondholders alleging expropriation of financial holdings by a developing country,<sup>79</sup> or venerable institutional investors asserting shareholders' rights against a large foreign oil company said to have close ties with the Kremlin.<sup>80</sup>

In each instance, arbitrators asked to interpret the contracts, as well as judges who review the awards and scholars who volunteer comment, may tend to evaluate procedural constraints of party consent in light of conscious or unconscious ideological inclinations. In this context, recourse to imprecise terms such as "left" and "right" will foster helpful analysis only if those labels serve as categories which beg for, rather than provide, enlightenment.

In the end, however, the health of arbitration will depend more on honest and mature debate than on ideology or dogma. In resolving tensions between efficiency and legitimacy, the soundest suggestions will remain imperfect, given that any proposal rests on words connected sequentially even while the reality of the conflict remains obstinately simultaneous in nature.

During the proceedings, arbitrators must be vigilant to respect constraints in the parties' agreement that might limit the format of arbitration to individual rather than collective claims. After the arbitration itself has ended, judges reviewing the award should remember that in the post-award stage of the arbitral process, the role of law consists principally in promoting the rule of law, in the sense of respect for fundamental to procedural fairness. Judicial enthusiasm for insuring the "right result" in contract construction should not normally outweigh the deference due to the arbitrators' good faith resolution of the questions entrusted to them by the litigants.

<sup>79</sup> See discussion of the Abaclat case (n. 23).

<sup>80</sup> See Harvard University v. Surgutneftegaz, 167 Fed. Appx. 266 (2nd Cir. 2006).

